BT4000 Big Button It works well with hearing aids, is light and doesn't have a cord, so you can carry it around your home and not worry about missing calls. And it's really easy to block calls you don't want to take. And if you've got an aid for each ear, you can use the handsfree speaker so you get sound to both. But if you don't want to use it, you can set up to nine of your frequently used or favourite numbers to dial quickly using each digit of your keypad. And it's really easy to block calls you don't want to take, like unwanted sales calls. But if you'd rather not hold it, you can make or take calls using a handsfree facility instead. You also get big buttons to make dialling easier. You can choose what kind of numbers you want to block calls from, and block calls from specific numbers. And if you don't want to take any calls, you can use the do not disturb mode. You may also be charged for using the 1571 service. However, large buttons on telephone keypads do not always have large numbers; this should be checked before purchase, or rental. Most pushbutton telephone keypads have a raised dot on the central five key to help orientate a user relying on touch. The size of these displays varies considerably, and is often limited on cordless handsets, look for models with large displays and clear contrast. Heres what we found when we reviewed them And, unlike smartphones, landline phones dont cost the Earth the models I tested for this article topped out at 100. Honestly, I found half that amount was sufficient to buy you a good product. It doesnt take me to tell you that our smartphone addiction is revealing some knockon consequences, from the relatively menial thumb tendonitis to the seriously worrying mental health issues. Mobile phones need signal, and their batteries run out quickly; neither of which applies to your home phone. If you need to call 999, the latter is the product to depend on. Ive spent more man hours than I care to recall trialling, testing and reviewing the different options from the major manufacturers, to find which ones are worth picking up and which should be left off the hook. So I looked elsewhere for points of difference design, functionality and ease of use. In fact, you won't even be able to use the latter unless your service provider allows it; read up before you buy. And, of course, how simple they are to pick up and dial a number. PanasonicThe buttons are big enough for those with viewing difficulties to be able to see what they're doing. And the design is reasonably sleek handset and base station slot together in a nice, ergonomic fashion.

Everything else is a little more complicated but at least its thoroughly explained in the manual. And what a wealth of features there are. Aside from basic things like answer phone and call blocking accomplished with the press of a single button, the phone can act as an intercom, a phonebook for your contacts, a baby monitor, and an alarm. Those looking for a solid phone to sit in their kitchen will find it simple enough, and those who want something a little more elaborate will find plenty to dig into. The phones are a good size and comfortable to hold with a decent heft which makes them feel sturdy. This is actually something that Google launched on its brand new Pixel 3 recently, but BT have been doing it for much longer. Once youve set it up, the caller has to say who they are, and then you can choose whether or not to accept or ignore the call. It works pretty seamlessly though setting it up is a bit of a faff and, don't worry, contacts you've already got saved in your phonebook will be directed straight through. Your mother won't have to deal with a machine every time she calls. They've put their "block" button right at the top of the keypad, so it's very prominent and easy to find. One press and you'll block whoever is calling. Also, unlike most of the other phones on this list, the blacklist is extensive, allowing you to block hundreds of numbers, rather than the poxy 20 or 30 on most of these phones. You could block all 0800 numbers from being sent and received, for example, or block all international numbers. Useful for teenagers with farflung love interests. Meanwhile the advanced model is cheaper but only stores 200 contacts, has matte keys and can save half an hour's worth of answerphone messages; though it does come with a slightly better battery life offering 22 hours of talk time. A worthy runner up. PanasonicThe keys are a little brighter and the handset is a little chunkier. Still, don't let that put you off.

This phone looks and feels premium, with a pleasing metallic sheen and a nice heft. As with the others at the top of this list, you're getting a phone that's also a baby monitor, an intercom, a phonebook and a calendar. For starters, the screen picks up fingerprints and earprints way too easily, which sort of spoils the luxurious design. You might very easily place the handset down, thinking it's charging, only to find out that it wasn't charging at all and you're out of battery when you need to make a call. It seemed like a waste of power so I tried to turn it off, and couldn't find any explanation of how to do so. Annoying. It certainly lives up to its name with nice big buttons that should be easy to read for those with visual impairments. The text on the screen is also large enough to be easily legible and the few menu buttons are selfexplanatory enough. The handset is nice and chunky but probably slightly heavier than most of the other devices on this list. As I don't have a hearing aid, I wasn't able to test out this feature myself. She said she thought it worked fine once someone set it up for her. The instruction manual for the Big Button isn't great. It seems to have been written for people who are more wellversed in technology than this phone's target audience. In addition, some features of the phone aren't mentioned in the instructions at all, forcing users to go online to find out how to do certain things. This is the only phone I reviewed that doesn't have an answering machine. A baffling exclusion if you ask me. Older people are the very generation who still use answering machine messages! GigasetYou'll get 300 hours out of the battery on standby, call blocking, baby monitoring, and a calendar, plus texting and even a wacky picture viewer Im unconvinced of the latters use, frankly. PanasonicIt's not necessarily bad but it fails to distinguish itself.

A dull, average design which looks like a 2006 mobile phone in a glossy black I am sick of saying this tech manufacturers, stop making products in glossy black. I don't want to see fingerprints all over my gadgets! Cute, but honestly, what kind of monster calls someone on a landline and doesn't immediately say who they are GigasetYou get 17 hours talk time out of the batteries which is alright, but aside from that it's a very standard phone. GigasetYes, its very handsome, but it does the bare minimum on the functionality front an answer machine, a phonebook, and call blocking. You can get all that for much cheaper higher up this list. PanasonicUntil it rings, you wouldn't even know it was a phone. The phone just feels a bit cheap and nasty, and the display is a bit meh. Set up is also quite fiddly. Theres call blocking but nothing else and the design is an uninspired as they come. Pretty unessential, Id say. That's because, basically, it's really hard to find corded landline phones anymore. Of the major brands I reached out to, only BT offers corded phones as a matter of course. Even then, they are considered outdated technology. Comparing the quality of these cordless phones with my desk phone which has a cord, I didn't notice any real difference. However, there is one very good reason to use a landline phone they work without power. During a power cut, corded landline phones draw power from the local telephone exchange which usually has a backup generator. Cordless phones can't do this because usually the base station requires power too. This means you can call the emergency services in the event of a fire or accident. Then again, most of us will have a mobile phone as a backup, so a corded phone is still probably not necessary for the vast majority of people. Allegedly Gigaset do the best with a variety of special equalising features but I really doubt the layperson will be able to hear much difference between them all.

Mobile phones contracts usually offer more free call time than landlines, they make it easier to block nuisance calls, and obviously their utility isn't limited to when you're at home. However, with fibre optic broadband becoming much more commonplace, even that necessity is dying out. Fibre optic broadband is an entirely separate kind of cabling, thus making it unnecessary to have a landline to use the internet.
